MILK AND STAR

Solo-exhibition Curdin Tones

The installation Milk and Star in the artists initiative Lost Property consists of objects that are symbols made of apparent meaningless everyday material as well as objects that contain a certain action within them. The work is based on an installation that Curdin Tones made previously for Het Torentje in Almelo.

From an printed oversized T-shirt a muscled man with his arms in the air looks up provokingly at the viewer. His shirt, which is a little too small, emphasizes his trained biceps against the neon-yellow background. It is a stereotype and an idealized image of manliness. On another T-shirt three boys are pruned that are playing with a kite, somewhere on the street. The kite seems ordinary, but then it becomes apparent that on the kite, which is held upside-down, the same muscular man is depicted that looked at you so provokingly from the other T-shirt. The two T-shirts show the same picture, only in one picture the boys dominate the image and in the other the man in the center of the picture, and the boys turn into the abstract background. Something strange happens in the shifting and reversing. You seem to be caught in between the everyday reality and the flat image; between material and an image as symbol.

Also in the upper space of Lost Property the viewer is activated. Here a heavily shining star with bright lamps hangs. It blinks in a mechanical rhythm and asks for attention like commercials in Las Vegas. The light shines on a beer table with glasses and cartons of milk. Some are half empty, like a group of people just walked away and can come back and sit down at any moment. The milk is offered, the visitors can pour a glass and temporarily participate in a social construct.

The movement between the objects, their material reality and their functioning as readable sign, repeats constantly in this installation. The two oversized T-shirts can be worn and in this manner they are part of the reality of the viewer. A pile of cloths asks to be 'read': The lumberjack motive, the Hawaii shirt of a guy with a mustache like Magnum P.I., a glittering red-orange blouse that calls the image into mind of a barbecuing and salsa man in a Caribbean setting. It is as if all kinds of types manliness are shown. Where the T-shirts still have the ambiguity of a physical object and a readable icon, these fabrics show their superficiality and refer to the mean with which we take on our identity and give it meaning.

In the installation Milk and Star things are subject to a process of exchange and seduction. Here the unstable boundary is continuously sought between the materialness of an object and our notion of it, with which apparent meaningless everyday materials become performative objects.

Location: Lost Property, De Leeuw van Vlaanderenstraat 33, 1061 CR Amsterdam
